commercial campaign for a new product range – but the challenge keeps me alive and passionate.

c. Who are your hairdressing heroes?

Sharon: Well, Trevor Sortie's Angelo Seminars – he is just magic. Obviously Sassoon who started the whole technical precision thing, and of course the late Alexandre de Paris... he was truly a long hair dress-working kid. I remember many years ago getting one of his instructional videos and I practiced and practiced. It really helped me to perfect long hair. And then one day I went to play the video to refresh my memory on some element and my then husband had watched a booty game over the top of it! Perhaps that was the start of the divorce...

c. After you and Emma are married with four kids

Share: They just do something with their hands – they seem to be able to move the hair effortlessly. They can cut too – but this is also very fluid, they would never be able to explain any of it. The Brits on the other hand are so technical and precise.

c. So after 43 years in the game, what's next?

Sharon: My next goal? Long Hair book number four, but this time also with an instructional DVD. Plus, I would love someone overseas to pick up the phone and invite me to come and do a show – expense no object. That would be the cherry on the cake. Because

But beyond all of that right now I love the enthusiasm when people come to one of my seminars and walk away confident. I love it when they see that it can be so easy to do hair well. I love all that young people now value dressing hair and there is a resurgence in an understanding that creativity is where you have competence across a range of hair disciplines... not just specialise in a routine or colouring. It takes me back to my early days.
